Not illustrated. 1922 Excerpt: . . . 93, 000, 000 x 2 186, 000, 000 miles diameter of earths orbit, the distance to the stars must be billions of miles or even more, they must be a terrific size, and the earth is only like a speck of dust in the Brobdinagian Universe, and c, and c, and c. But we have not yet done with that angle. Regarded as an angle of parallax, and considered to be equivalent to just such an angle as a surveyor would use in measuring a plot of land, it was of course presumed that the two lines of sight converged so as to meet at a point thirty-five million miles away. (See diagram 18. ) This, however, is a mistake, for the two lines of observation, when placed in their proper relations to each other, and in the order as taken, should be as in diagram...
