But Stella did not easily get over that night s depression, although it did not prepare her in the least for the terrible news brought her about six weeks later, that at the time she was so overcome with grief at the bare thought of never seeing her father again, he was dying at home as unexpectedly to the rest of the family as to herself. In the letters she received it was stated that on the Thursday night he retired to rest as well as usual. No one had been alarmed about him at any time, although it had been noticed that he had never regained his spirits from the time his wife died nearly four months before. During the night he was seized with some internal hemorrhage, and the hastily summoned doctors announced that the case was hopeless and that..
