A New Method for Testing Milk, III. Feeding for Milk and Butter, Agricultural College, Miss. Jun, 1892 The cabbage crop of the south is especially subject to damage by insects, the species described in this bulletin having been observed on the crop grown at the Station in 1891. The aim has been to make the description of each species concise, but at the same time to give sufficient of the characteristic appearance of each to enable those interested to readily, recognize the different kinds attacking their cabbage, and the accompanying illustrations will aid much toward this end. Part of the illustrations have been obtained from the U.S. Department of Agriculture, through the kindness of Dr. Riley. Figs 1, 3-12, 16, 17-18, are after Riley; Fig. 13 after C. M. Weed; while Figs. 2, 14, 15, are original. A straight line at the side of an illustration indicates the natural length of the insect. The safe and economical destruction of these pests is of great practical importance and the remedies given are those which have proved of value in our hands. The Imported Cabbage Worm. (Pieris rapae, Linn.) This insect was imported from Europe, being first noticed in this country in Quebec in 1859. From that point its spread southward and westward was very rapid and now it is quite generally distributed throughout that portion of the United States lying east of the Rocky Mountains. This species has largely taken the place of its kindred native species protodice. Description. - The adult form of this insect is the white butterfly...
